Call for participants

The Australian and New Zealand Environmental History Network (ANZEHN) is holding a workshop on teaching environmental history and humanities. Teaching remains a crucial arena for the dissemination of environmental historical knowledge and cultivation of the next generation of scholars in environmental history and humanities. This workshop aims to foster collaboration in these areas of teaching and to develop teaching strategies around curriculum design and method to enhance quality teaching. It will bring together experienced teachers in environmental history and humanities, the National Museum of Australia, and those who would like to develop or extend their teaching in environmental history and/or humanities.

The workshop will be run as a series of discussion forums with contributions encouraged from participants throughout. There will be no registration fee.

Key topics

- What do we teach and why?
- Who do we teach and how can we broaden our audience?
- Environmental history and the environmental humanities
- Projects and fieldwork

- Decolonising and feminising curricula
- Teaching and assessment formats
- Collaborative pedagogies
